1. Michelle Obama Watch blog

Gina McCauley's blog on African-American women in pop culture has never attracted this kind of attention.

The 3-year-old site has a mostly African-American audience. But she launched a new Michelle Obama Watch blog in June to monitor and critique media coverage of the potential first lady, and since then, feminists of all colors have been linking and commenting.

2. How women can save the Japanese economy

In the Land of the Rising Sun, the glass ceiling is more shatter-proof than elsewhere among developed countries. It's in Japan's interest for that to change.

Ranked as the lowest of all industrialized nations in terms of empowerment of women in a 2005 World Economic Forum report and saddled with the widest wage gap in the industrialized world, Japan is still a developing country in terms of gender equality.

4. CNN's Young People Who Rock

CNN has a blog called Young People Who Rock. In it they feature an even mixture of young men and women who are conducting inspirational and remarkable lives.

From the YPWR site -

Young People Who Rock is a weekly interview series focused on people under 30 -- from CEOs to entertainers to athletes to community and political leaders -- who are doing remarkable things.

Visit Young People Who Rock and read about amazing young women at the link below.

5. July Site of the Month

Stop Porn Culture is dedicated to challenging the pornography industry and an increasingly pornographic pop culture. Our work toward ending industries of sexual exploitation is grounded in a feminist analysis of sexist, racist, and economic oppression. We affirm sexuality that is rooted in equality and free of exploitation, coercion, and violence.
